The increasing interest in the protection of historic districts has been an important aspect of European urban history during the last fifty years. The three books discussed in the present article provide an analysis of different aspects of this phenomenon. They are written by authors belonging to different cultural contexts (a French architectural and planning historian, an international group of three geographers and a British planner and conservation specialist) and do not necessarily share the same interests and points of view, as the keywords that appear in the titles – patrimoine, gentrification, conservation – clearly show. Nevertheless, they may collectively be read as important contributions to a discussion of the role played by urban conservation in contemporary European societies. The books are meant for a wide audience, wider than the academic communities for which they are primarily intended, not only because they are the result of long ongoing teaching activities, but also because the authors hope to actively influence the way in which the historic built environment is perceived and transformed. On the one hand, these works remind us that conservation is becoming progressively recognised as an indispensable activity (the 'age of consensus' evoked by John Pendlebury) and has an increasingly international dimension, epitomised by such Unesco policies as the list of World Heritage sites, created in 1972; on the other hand, they argue that issues of social
