

AT THE END OF THE SENTENCE

Asynchronous vs. Synchronous NAND

At the heart of all electronic devices is the concept of a regulatory signal, which coordinates the rate at which instructions are executed and acts as a kind of conductor to keep everything in sync. Historically, NAND devices used two regulatory signals: the "RE signal" (for Read Events) and the "WE signal" (for Write Events). As NAND evolved and increased in speed, however, it became necessary to introduce a new signal, called a "strobe." Present in all modern DDR NAND implementations, the strobe helps the controller to handle read and write data at high speed. It starts after receiving a signal from the host indicating a read or write event – think of a stopwatch, which can start and stop on demand. Depending on its current task, the strobe plays slightly different roles. During a write event, it is directly managed by the controller, whereas it plays a more supporting role during a read event.

With ONFI 2.0, synchronous logic was introduced to the ONFI NAND specification. Synchronous devices operate a "free-running" clock, which means that, as long they are receiving power, the clock will continuously run – much like a standard wall clock. This clock is used as a reference for the strobe. Modern ONFI NAND implementations eschew the use of a clock once again in favor of using only the strobe. Every generation of Toggle NAND was asynchronous.

It is often followed by a comma. Here are some sentences with this idiom: We worked hard, and in the end, we achieved our goal. In the end, what really matters.
